Ellen Shaw, RN, MSN, CPNP, assesses, diagnoses and treats children with a variety of gastrointestinal problems. As a nurse practitioner, her primary focus is on helping children and their parents understand their medical conditions and gain the skills and confidence to manage them. Ms. Shaw has a special interest in constipation and encopresis, and treats children with an integrated medical, behavioral, and nutritional approach.

Ms. Shaw's patients include many children with feeding and growing problems. In addition to addressing their short-term needs, she works to help them develop lifelong good eating habits. Ms. Shaw also manages many medically fragile children who require nasogastric or gastrostomy tube feedings.

Ms. Shaw graduated from List College with honors and distinction. She was inducted into the Sigma Theta Tau Nursing Honor Society after finishing her master's degree in nursing at Yale University. She is a member of the National Association of Pediatric Nurse Practitioners and was trained as a "Nature Champion" by the National Environmental Education Foundation and the Audubon Society to train other pediatric healthcare providers about the health benefits of contact with nature. She precepts master's degree students in nursing as part of their clinical training and lectures at the nursing school.
